Sometimes I get asked how I get through my workload on the PC, and the answer is simple: I'm efficient with my time. We spend a lot of time in this industry, and using the right tools enhances our work. When we use tools that don't match our workflow, we end up wasting time, either losing valuable hours, or doing too much work in one shot. Let's start with the elephant in the room. Although many of you are already using Photoshop, or know about it, a huge batch of you have never heard about it. I also feel strongly that tons of our readers are Adobe Photoshop (or "Pix") hoarders. For many, Photoshop is their primary photo editor — and if it doesn't support them now, they'll never use another photo editor. There is a big gray area in the world of photo editing. Some people hate Photoshop and swear by Corel, Claris or Corel Paint Shop Pro. Others like Photoshop because it's what they learned in school. And there are others who swear that "Photoshop is too complicated" or "It doesn't do what I need it to do."

So how did we channel that energy and enthusiasm? We shifted the focus to users that were ready to change their workflow, rather than reinvent the wheel. And so it was that Photoshop came to the web. Today, there are over a billion monthly active Photoshop users out there. We knew that we'd face many challenges in bringing the product to market. Fortunately, after the first wave of enthusiasm, we also had a large number of users questioning how we could ever deliver the product at the level of quality demanded. This was a very challenging time, because we were also faced with the reality that most of our users were still on a DOS-based PC and needed a high level of technical know-how to use the product. In order to access the direct product, we first delivered an "elementary" version that allowed the user to create documents. We understood that we'd need to educate users incrementally if we were to gain the attention of the market. Sooner or later, users would be ready to expand the capability of their workflow and explore the product. Today, we have over 380 million monthly active Professionals with Photoshop installed. And so we launched PS CC 2020 in March of 2018, followed by the basic product in May of 2018. Since then, what initially took many years has been achieved in less than two years. Today, the web is the largest market for Photoshop and the industry-leading platform for customers to upload and edit the images of our fast-growing collection of images, artwork and graphics. e3d0a04c9c
