I will, however, make a couple of comments about the Pencil tool that may be disconcerting to novices and even more experienced users: First, when you draw with the Pencil tool, you move forward and backward by pressing the left and right arrow keys. I have a bad habit of doing this when I'm trying to preview images, and the impact of my mistake shows up before my eyes. The other interesting aspect of the Pencil tool is the "Select extra area" mode, which allows you to select a circular or elliptical selection of a specific foreground color. In the second mode, you select the color as well. What you then get is a copy of the image area under the selection that you are colorizing. I think a big part of the problem with the Pencil tool for beginners is that it's initially hard to figure out how it works. Users who have been using it longer generally know how to draw with the Pencil tool and what's possible, but this is probably the first reviewers' experience with the tool. The overall interface is pretty snappy, and the latest version of Adobe Lightroom is easier to navigate and faster than ever. One of the first things I noticed was that as usual, the entire interface takes on a more three-dimensional appearance. This is because the three panes for your photo appear on a curved plane instead of a flat plane, and user-selectable editing tools (like the pencil, eraser, and fill erase) and other controls are moved slightly down and to the right. Many features in Lightroom 5 are familiar. The catalog window, including the Masters, Places, and Tags windows, has the same appearance as in older versions. Instead of using the camera capture model (usually Camera RAW), Lightroom 5 uses the new file format NEF.
