Only a few short months after the launch of their first iPad-friendly application, Adobe announced that they are bringing their core product lineup to the iPad format. This move comes as no surprise, as Apple had given them permission to do so in their guidelines. The software giant has even been praised by photographers and designers alike for embracing the iPad essentially as their primary photography and design-based platform. To be honest, there are no surprises as the software company has already been embracing the digital media tablet for a long time, from the very start of the iPad's life. The idea of bringing Adobe Photoshop to the iPad platform seems like that long-awaited idea that is finally ripe for implementation. As the package contains Lightroom and Photoshop, it is likely that the iPad port will provide users with some of the best Photoshop features available in the market. The software already has a decent set of editing tools on the iOS platform, so the addition of support for extensive RAW, JPEG, PSD, and TIF files should enable it to match or beat rival applications such as Pixelmator or Photoshop Express. One of Adobe's own employees, Michael ("Dmack") Buckley, has already hinted that Lightroom for iPad will initially be limited to RAW and PSD files. Later on, he says they will be releasing support for TIFF and JPEG files as well.

Photoshop is the most powerful and widely used image editing software in existence. It is also notoriously difficult to grasp during the first few sessions because the interface is so intimidating. Don't expect Photoshop to be an all-encompassing mobile and browser-based image editing engine that can beat the best competitors in the market. Photoshop requires a bit of a learning curve to become proficient at it. Are you a design school student? It's unlikely that you'll pick up Photoshop after taking a one-week introductory course on the application. You could spend months on that course and still not be able to use Photoshop well. In addition to the improvements in the latest update on Photoshop, users can now get even more out of their experience with their workflow by getting real-time collaborative feedback on projects. The new "Share for Review" tab in the Photoshop file menu provides a master-detailed view of each part of an image, which helps collaborate more efficiently with clients, partners, or existing experts. Working collaboratively also makes colors and text smarter and faster than ever, and now outlines and shapes are a breeze to work with (even from the web). The new "Auto-texture" feature powered by Adobe Sensei is particularly powerful when used with the addition of the new "Global Fix" feature that automatically selects a global tone across a range of greys. You can also use the new "Select All" feature to select and modify any text, layer, bitmap or vector object in a single click. Finally, the new "Delete" command in the Finder in Photoshop now allows you to use a single click to easily and quickly erase any block of selected content, which helps speed up your workflow while maintaining quality.
